TRUST YOUR AUNTIE.

Buntii.

For ShoppersFor Traders

Trust your auntie.

Strawberries: £3 at noon,

90p by five.

The shops on your street drop their prices every evening — greengrocers, fishmongers, bakeries. You just never knew until you'd already walked past.

Now you do.

Why Buntii

Strawberries: £3 at noon, 90p by five.

Buntii tells you when.

The shops on your street drop their prices every evening. Now you know exactly when.

- The gap is the point

Same shop, same food, Few hours apart. We just tell you which four hours.

- Down your road, not down the motorway

No chains, no delivery vans, no warehouse in Leeds. Only the shops you already walk past. Can't walk to it? It's not on here.

- The actual thing, not a mystery bag

You see exactly what's reduced and go get exactly that. No surprise bags, no hoping you like beetroot. You choose.

- The bin doesn't need feeding. You do.

Everything you grab was heading for the skip. Cheaper for you, less waste for everyone. Nice bonus. Not the reason you came.

Tab 1

FOR SHOPPERS

The deals on your street. Before they're gone.

Alternate: Your store next door cuts its prices every evening. Now you'll know.

Every evening, the shops near you quietly drop their prices. Buntii shows you what's reduced, where, and right now (When). You get the thing you actually wanted, for a fraction of what it cost at noon.

WHY BUNTII

Pick what you like, Not a mystery bag. You a person need to have a freedom of choice, and Buntii supports it, you see it, you want it, you walk over. No surprise bags. No gambling on what's inside.

Real food. Real prices. Fresh fruit, fish off the ice, bread from this morning. The food you were going to buy anyway, minus most of the price. Near closing, plenty of it is half price or better.

Independents first. Not just the big supermarkets. The greengrocer, the fishmonger, the baker your nan trusts. The shops most apps never bother to list.

Why pay £3 for strawberries at noon when they're 90p by five? Same strawberries. Same shop. Your auntie always knew when to turn up. Now you do too.

HOW IT WORKS

1. Tell us where you are.
2. See what's reduced near you, right now.
3. Walk over, buy it, home before dinner.

Food waste is up nearly 40% in five years. Your auntie has had enough of that. Buntii points you at the food that's already been marked down tonight, on your own street.

FOR TRADERS

You already drop your prices at five. Now the whole street will know.

Alternate: Clearing surplus at closing time? Let the neighbourhood in on it.

The trays you cut down at low prices at close, or bin. Right now nobody outside the shop ever hears about them. Buntii will tell them.

You post what you're reducing→ we put them online→shoppers get a nudge → they come in before you're down.

WHY BUNTII

More feet through the door. The surplus you'd cut to the bone or throw out, sold instead. Recover the cash, not the bin bag. UK retail bins around 270,000 tonnes of food a year, and under a tenth of it is ever redistributed.

No till. No hardware. No faff. send a WhatsApp/ upload an image, you can post a deal. Ten seconds and it's live. Nothing to install, nothing to plug in.

Your shop. Your prices. You decide what's reduced and by how much. Buntii just carries the word down the road.

You've been dropping prices at closing time for years. About time the street showed up for it.

HOW IT WORKS

1. Got surplus? Snap it. Item, old price, new price.
2. Shoppers nearby get pinged.
3. They come in and buy it. today, gone.

Greengrocers. Fishmongers. Bakers. Butchers. Market stalls. The independents who know their customers by name. Margins are thin enough already, so every tray you sell instead of bin is money back in the till.

OUR STORY (Not Yet Decided)

Why we started Buntii.

I put the yellow stickers on. Part-time, I work the markdown floor at Sainsbury's, the trolley of food that has to go by tonight. Perfectly good stuff, cut and cut again, and whatever doesn't sell gets thrown out. Every shift. It does your head in.

I lived in Bethnal Green, then Edmonton Green, and saw the other side of it on every high street. Turkish greengrocers, fishmongers, bakers, all dropping their prices as the evening wore on. Trays of strawberries, whole sea bass, going for a fraction of the noon price. Except nobody knew unless they happened to be standing right there.

Meanwhile everyone I know is watching food prices climb, nearly forty percent in five years, and wondering where the money went. And seventeen billion pounds of good food goes in the bin every year, a grand of it from the average family of four.

That's a mad gap. The food is there. The prices are already dropping. People need it. And the whole thing is invisible.

Buntii makes it visible. Every reduction on your street, the independents first, the shops that actually know you, in one place, in real time. Not a mystery bag. Not the supermarket only. The greengrocer, the fishmonger, the baker. The aunties who have always known how to feed a family for less.

We're starting on Green Lanes, the densest mile of independent grocers and fishmongers in London. But North London is the wedge, not the ceiling. Every high street in this country has the same shops dropping the same prices to nobody. We're going to switch all of it on.

Trust your auntie.
